Robert,

I reviewed again your draft stipulation and disagree with your assessment. Why not simply provide us with the prior art, without all of the equivocation and qualifications, particularly the last sentence that you added to the stipulation. Unfortunately, it seems that we do not have a choice but to file a response at this point, unless you will reconsider our proposed version.

Dear Raymond

That is fine. However, I am not sure that I understand your comment about the changes creating an incentive NOT to turn over prior art. In fact, it is just the opposite. The revised proposal makes clear that we would be identifying all printed publication prior art (which is the only type of prior art we can submit in the request for reexamination) that would be responsive to the interrogatory about our present invalidity contentions. From our conversations, I thought that was the information you sought.

Robert,

Thank you for the email. Unfortunately, your revisions to the proposed stipulation are not acceptable to B&D. We had suggested a basic stipulation for the disclosure of prior art, but your changes seem to provide Royal with an incentive NOT to turn over all prior art.

Therefore, our client feels it is better to simply file a response brief with our position. Thanks,

Raymond
